HARROW ON THE HILL · NOW IN DUBAI

A HERITAGE WORN DAILY

Stet Fortuna Domus

Let the fortune of the house stand

For more than four centuries the name of Harrow has been carried, quite literally, on the backs of its pupils in a blue coat, a straw hat, a ribbon of colour worn with pride. A school dress at Harrow has never been mere clothing. It is a daily inheritance; a way of belonging to something older and larger than oneself.

An iconic school dress, quietly introduced

There was no official school dress at Harrow until around 1850 and even then it developed gradually, many of its conventions shaped by the boys themselves. Older boys wore black tailcoats and waistcoats, striped trousers and top hats; younger boys wore short jackets without tails.

By the 1830s the straw hat, first carried on the cricket field, had become common in the summer term. By 1888 blue jackets, bluers and grey flannel trousers, greyers had replaced tailcoats for games and half-holidays. During the First World War, as a measure of economy, these became the daily dress.

The origins of the School's blue and white colours, however, remain a mystery to this day.

"The conventions were shaped not by decree, but by the boys themselves."

The language of the school dress

To wear the Harrow school dress is to speak a little of its history.

Harrow School's dress code evolved gradually from ordinary Victorian clothing into a distinctive uniform. By the mid-1800s, boys wore black tailcoats, waistcoats, striped trousers, and top hats, with tailcoats initially reserved for taller boys and a black-or-white tie mandated by the headmaster. Grey flannel trousers and a blue jacket emerged in the 1880s for sport and casual wear, creating a split between formal "School dress" and the more relaxed "half-change".

Wartime economy during WWI made the casual combination (with a straw hat) the standard uniform, a change that stuck even after the war, while WWII rationing limited top hats to student prefects (Monitors) and later made straw hats scarce and temporarily optional.

The straw hat itself traces back to 1820s cricket wear, with its shape standardizing by the 1870s; a special speckled version for the cricket team disappeared around 2005 when its supplier could no longer be found. Beyond the core school dress, various sports-related garments (striped jackets, caps, fezzes) carry their own rules tied to seniority or achievement, and Monitors alone may wear top hats and carry ceremonial canes with formal dress. School dress violations, like an untucked shirt or a missing hat, result in a disciplinary morning check-in known as being "put on Custo."
